

Venture firm Lightstone taps Twin Cities exec as venture partner

Apr 11, 2016, 2:26pm CDT Updated: Apr 11, 2016, 9:19pm CDT

NANCY KUEHN | MSPBJ

Stacy Enxing Seng

Lightstone Ventures has named longtime Twin Cities med-tech executive Stacy Enxing Seng as a venture partner.

Enxing Seng will scout for deals and vet potential investments as part of her role at the firm. However, Lightstone doesn't have plans to open a formal Twin Cities office or step up investing activity here, a spokeswoman said.

Lightstone makes early stage investments in med-tech and biopharmaceutical startups. It has offices in Menlo Park, Calif.; Boston; Boulder, Colo.; Dublin; and Singapore.

Enxing Seng was most recently president of Covidien's Plymouth-based vascular therapies business, which she joined following ev3's $2.6 billion sale to Covidien. (Medtronic has since bought Covidien for $50 billion.) Before joining ev3, she held roles at Scimed Life Systems Inc. and Boston Scientific Corp.

"After working in the medical technology industry for almost 30 years, I'm delighted to join Lightstone during what I believe is an optimal time to be investing in medical devices," Enxing Seng said in a prepared statement. "The firm is well positioned to play an important role to advance new devices and treatments ultimately improving the quality of healthcare and patient outcomes."

Katharine Grayson

Staff reporter

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal